Howard Pyle (1853-1911) is considered one of America’s most influential artists during the so-called “Golden Age of Illustration.” This cultural phenomenon began about 1880, when improvements in printing technology led to a marked increase in publishing and inspired high-quality illustrations to accompany all varieties of texts. Mass-produced illustrated magazines became the most popular form of information and entertainment until around 1925, when photographic images largely replaced illustrations in publications. Over his thirty-year career, Pyle generated fame for drawings and paintings that richly evoke the life and character of American historical figures and events, as well as pirate lore, medieval tales, Arthurian legends, and allegorical subjects.

Pyle believed that well-illustrated books and magazines fostered public understanding and appreciation of art, and he sought to advance the standards of his young profession through teaching. Beginning in 1894, at the height of his career, Pyle taught at the Drexel Institute in Philadelphia until in 1900, when he opened his own school of art in Wilmington, Delaware. Between 1898 and 1903, Pyle led a summer school for illustration here in Chadds Ford. An extraordinarily perceptive teacher, Pyle fostered the careers of more than 150 young artists and illustrators, Including Clifford Ashley, Harvey Dunn, Violet Oakley, Frank Schoonover, Jessie Wilcox Smith, N.C. Wyeth, and many others.

WORKING EN GRISAILLE

The term "en grisaille" is used several times in this gallery. It refers to paintings made using only shades of black, white, and gray. Working in this limited color range resulted in paintings that were sure to reproduce well in black and white.
publications. N.C. Wyeth usually worked in full color, regardless of the printing techniques being employed.

His incredible eye for tonal value meant that his paintings, even when reproduced in black and white, retained their distinct readability.
William Henry Dethlef Koerner (1878–1938)
*
Through Mud to Glory, 1914

Oil on canvas

Gift of Ruth Koerner Oliver (artist’s daughter), 1986

After a stint as a staff artist for the Chicago Tribune and other newspapers, William Henry Dethlef Koerner decided to further his art education first at the Art Students League and then with Howard Pyle in Wilmington. He undertook hundreds of magazine commissions, including this one for Good Housekeeping, illustrating the article “Decoration Day” by Eugene Wood in 1914. Decoration Day was first celebrated in 1868, specifically to pay tribute to the Civil War dead. Over the years, however, the celebration has turned into the holiday known today as Memorial Day.
Howard Pyle (1853–1911)

The Charge, 1904

Oil on canvas

Gift of Mr. and Mrs. Howard P. Brokaw, 2007

Howard Pyle creates a scene of chaos filled with individual narratives in his painting The Charge, an illustration for Robert W. Chambers’s short story “Non-Combatants,” which appeared in Harper’s Monthly in November 1904. The Charge conveys a moment of intense action in a Civil War battle. Pyle creates a wall of Union soldiers that comes forward toward the viewer and overwhelms the Confederate soldiers in the foreground. The story reveals that these fierce Union fighters are actually members of a Union band, technically non-combatants who were called upon to fight in a surprise battle.
N.C. Wyeth (1882–1945)

The Bloody Angle, 1912

Oil on canvas

Gift of Charles S. Crompton, Jr. in memory of his wife, Milbrey Dean Crompton, 2014

Wyeth intended The Bloody Angle to evoke the general horror of war and specifically to depict a crucial part of the Battle of Spotsylvania, Virginia (1864) for Mary Johnston’s novel Cease Firing.
Johnston’s text is powerful. “Then the storm broke,” she wrote, “and the angle became the spot on earth where, it is estimated, in all the history of the earth the musketry fire was the heaviest. It became The Bloody Angle.”

Wyeth compressed both blue and gray soldiers into the lower two thirds of the picture, with the figures in the chaos of battle rising to a compositional angle symbolizing a horrific apex in the history of the war and of the country. He admitted to Johnston that the composition was also constructed with Houghton Mifflin’s advertising department in mind, feeling it would make an effective design for an advertising poster.
In his painting The Shell, Howard Pyle depicts the caves dug into a hillside as bomb shelters by families in Vicksburg, Mississippi, during the city’s Civil War siege. The great danger of these caves is described in detail in a first-hand account by William W. Lord, Jr. in “A Child at the Siege of Vicksburg,” published in Harper’s Monthly in December 1908. Despite the fact that the caves were shelters for non-combatants, errant shells caused collapses of the tunnels carved into the earth. In addition to this painting, the article was also illustrated with photographs, foreshadowing the demise of the use of illustrations in the popular media.
Howard Pyle (1853–1911)

The Spy, 1905

Oil on canvas

Gift of Mr. and Mrs. Howard P. Brokaw, 2007

The Spy, depicting a female Civil War spy, first appeared in Harper’s Monthly in February 1904 to illustrate Richard W. Chamber’s story “Special Messenger.” Though aspects of the character resemble the life of Confederate spy Belle Boyd, Chambers’s unnamed character is fictional. As the story unfolds, we learn that the main character is carrying a message to Union officers and trying to evade Confederate soldiers in pursuit. Pyle’s illustration captures perfectly the wary mood of the subject as described by Chambers: “Sitting her worn saddle, sensitive face partly turned, she listened, her eyes sweeping the bit of open ground behind her. Nothing moved there.”
Violet Oakley (1874–1961)

Love Your Enemies, ca. 1897

Oil on canvas

Gift of the Violet Oakley Memorial Foundation, 1983

After studying at the Art Students League of New York and the Pennsylvania Academy of the Fine Arts, Violet Oakley joined Howard Pyle’s illustration class at the Drexel Institute.
Throughout her career, she remained close with other women artists who studied with Pyle and worked in illustration. This painting was probably created for Pyle’s advanced class in illustration, in which he emphasized compositional groupings of figures. Pyle often assigned themes similar to those he depicted in his own work. Oakley’s painting is related to Pyle’s work of the same subject titled The Enemy at the Door, published in Scribner’s Magazine in 1895.
Anna Whelan Betts (1873–1959)

From Post to Post the Horseman Passed, ca. 1899

Oil on board

Purchased with Museum funds, 1972

Howard Pyle organized the illustrations for the serial publication of Paul Leicester Ford’s novel Janice Meredith: A Story of the Revolution in 1899. Not surprisingly, several of his students were among the illustrators selected. Anna Whelan Betts studied with Pyle in Philadelphia and was invited to join his summer school in Chadds Ford in 1899. While Betts’s work often focused on women’s lives, here she joins in the Pyle tradition of illustrating scenes from the Revolutionary War—this time for a story centering on the daughter of a colonial Tory who assists George Washington and Paul Revere.
Howard Pyle (1853–1911)

Arnold Tells His Wife of the Discovery of His Treason, 1898

Oil on canvas

Gift of Julia Bissell Leisenring, 2005

The wealth of publications about the American Revolution in the late nineteenth and early twentieth centuries increased demand for related illustrations. Teaching his classes in the city of Philadelphia and on the Brandywine Battlefield, Howard Pyle was very well positioned to take up this topic. He and his students examined the period from all angles, with a wealth of resources on hand. This painting illustrated Henry Cabot Lodge’s The Story of the Revolution, a historical account of the war, which highlighted the transformation of Benedict Arnold from heroic Major General of the Continental Army to the most famous traitor of the Revolution.
Ellen Bernard Thompson Pyle
(1876–1936)

The Immigrants, 1899

Oil on canvas

Purchased with the Museum Volunteers’ Fund, 1983
Ellen Bernard Thompson Pyle created this illustration for Paul Leicester Ford’s novel Janice Meredith: A Story of the Revolution before she married Howard Pyle’s brother Walter. Like many women artists of the era, Ellen Pyle put her career on hold during her marriage. She returned to illustration after her husband’s death in 1919, supporting her family with her popular covers for The Saturday Evening Post featuring flappers—a generation of modern, fashionable, and intelligent young women with short hair and rising hemlines.
Howard Pyle (1853–1911)

The Nation Makers, ca. 1902

Oil on canvas

Purchased through a grant from the Mabel Pew Myrin Trust, 1984
One of Howard Pyle’s finest paintings, The Nation Makers demonstrates many of the compositional lessons he passed on to his students. The action-filled scene is tightly cropped, diagonal lines are used to create a feeling of movement, and red highlights lead the viewer’s eye throughout the painting. Pyle painted this work in 1902 during a summer school session near the site of the Revolutionary War’s Battle of Brandywine in Chadds Ford. He considered The Nation Makers among his most important works, sending it on a national tour between 1903 and 1908.
Howard Pyle (1853–1911)

They Used to Drill Every Evening, ca. 1892

Oil on canvas mounted on board

Purchased with funds given anonymously, 1978
Although he illustrated a variety of themes, Howard Pyle preferred subjects from history, particularly the medieval period in England and the American Revolution. He knew that printmakers at this time were still unable to correctly reproduce colored images for illustrations; therefore, he painted in a black and white, a technique called grisaille. They Used to Drill Every Evening is an illustration for Pyle’s own story “The Soldiering of Beniah Stidham” published in St. Nicholas in December 1892. Pyle depicts colonial soldiers mustering before a tavern in Wilmington, Delaware, in the days before the Battle of Brandywine, as curious townspeople look on.
Howard Pyle (1853–1911)
*Grandmother’s Story of Bunker Hill Battle, 1892
Oil on canvas
Gift of Mr. and Mrs. Howard P. Brokaw, 2007

Howard Pyle illustrated Oliver Wendell Holmes’s poem *Grandmother’s Story of Bunker Hill Battle as She Saw it from the Belfry, which was originally written in 1875 to commemorate the centennial of the skirmish. The painting first appeared in Holmes’s collected poetry in 1892 but was republished many times, including on the cover of a 1925 Houghton Mifflin publication. The painting seems to focus on these lines from the poem:

*In the hush of expectation, in the awe and trepidation
Of the dread approaching moment, we are well-nigh breathless all;
Though the rotten bars are failing on the rickety belfry railing,
We are crowding up against them like the waves against a wall.*
Howard Pyle (1853–1911)

Viewing the Battle of Bunker’s Hill, 1901

Oil on canvas

Lent by Rita and Lawrence Pereira in memory of Anna and Hermann Moellers
Prior to his terms as President of the United States, Woodrow Wilson was a professor of history and political science at a number of colleges and universities. In this role, he wrote “Colonies and Nation,” appearing in Harper’s New Monthly Magazine in 1901, illustrated by this Howard Pyle painting. The article was a part of Wilson’s five volume A History of the American People, which included ten illustrations by Pyle. The Battle of Bunker Hill took place early in the American Revolution, on June 17, 1775, in Charlestown, Massachusetts. Colonists in Boston crowded onto rooftops to view the nearby skirmish which ended in a British victory.
Peter Hurd (1904–1984)

The Pirate’s Cruise, 1931

Oil on canvas

Gift of Mr. and Mrs. Porter Schutt, 1971

Long before he was known as a painter of the American Southwest, Peter Hurd studied with N.C. Wyeth, who would later become his father-in-law. In order to support himself and his young family, Hurd took on some of the many illustration commissions that flowed to Wyeth. In the instance of The Pirate’s Cruise, The John C. Winston Company agreed to have Hurd illustrate their new edition of Mark Twain’s The Adventures of Tom Sawyer under the supervision of Wyeth. According to Hurd: “I would discuss the subject and composition with Mr. Wyeth before beginning it, then carry out his daily criticism until finally we felt an impasse had been reached and he would take over for the last magical transformation.”
Robert Louis Stevenson’s novel David Balfour (1924), also known as Cattriona, is a sequel to his novel Kidnapped, both illustrated for Scribner’s by N.C. Wyeth. He created a total of 29 paintings for the two books, both of which are set in Scotland in the mid-1700s. While Wyeth’s cover accurately foreshadows the dangerous adventures in the pages of the book, the other illustrations in David Balfour allude the centrality of the character of Catriona as well, and the blossoming romance between the two characters. This painting has been cut down from its original size, which included empty blocks above and below the image where the book’s title would have been inserted, along with the phrase “With Pictures by N.C. Wyeth.”
N.C. Wyeth (1882–1945)

Death of Edwin, 1921

Oil on canvas

Gift of Mr. and Mrs. Harl McDonald, 1972

The novel The Scottish Chiefs (1810) by Jane Porter is set in the late-13th and early-14th centuries during the revolt of Scottish nobility against the rule of Edward I of England.
England. In his 1921 illustration for the penultimate image in the book, N.C. Wyeth depicts William Wallace, the leader of the rebellion and hero of the story, standing over the body of his beloved companion Edwin Ruthven. The sight of the young and faithful Edwin, shot in the breast, so stuns Wallace he can no longer resist capture (and certain death) at the hands of his English enemies.

In this painting, Wyeth illuminated the slain Edwin with a blast of cold, silvery moonlight; it spreads out halo-like around his head and visually reinforces Wallace’s earlier reference to “that angel youth.” The young man represented “truth, manhood, and nobleness” and the dramatic lighting elevates his character to an even higher plane. The darkness of the painting holds the menace of the enemy, clearly felt, if not clearly distinguished.

Jessie Willcox Smith (1863–1935)
Goldilocks and the Three Bowls, ca. 1900
Mixed media on illustration board
Purchased with the Museum Volunteers’ Fund, 1975
Some of Howard Pyle’s students, primarily the women, branched off to specialize in children’s book illustration. After working several years as a kindergarten teacher in the early 1880s, Jessie Willcox Smith studied at the Philadelphia School of Design for Women, the Pennsylvania Academy of the Fine Arts, and under Howard Pyle at the Drexel Institute. Goldilocks and the Three Bowls contains essential elements of this familiar story. Children often note one discrepancy in the image: there is steam rising from the medium-sized bowl. In the story, Goldilocks complained that this bowl’s porridge was too cold.
Howard Pyle (1853–1911)
A Thousand Miles a Day, ca. 1900
Oil on canvas
Purchased with the Andrew L. Johnson Fund, 1976

Houghton Mifflin published a new edition of Nathaniel Hawthorne’s A Wonder Book for Girls and Boys and Tanglewood Tales with six illustrations by Howard Pyle in 1900. Appearing as the frontispiece to the volume, A Thousand Miles a Day depicts the mythical Pegasus ridden by Bellerophon. The painting served as an illustration for the story “The Chimera,” in which the Greek hero Bellerophon tames the mythical winged horse and goes on to slay the Chimera. Pyle’s inclusion of the aerial view at lower left reminds us of Pegasus’s extraordinary ability to fly, and the ease with which he passed over “a thousand miles a day.”
Clifford W. Ashley (1881–1947)

The Whaler, 1927

Oil on canvas

Gift of Harry G. Haskell, Jr., 1976

Originally from the whaling center of New Bedford, Massachusetts, Clifford W. Ashley was equal parts artist, sailor, and author. He was a classmate of N.C. Wyeth in Boston and both artists eventually came to study with Howard Pyle in Wilmington, Delaware. This painting was made just after Ashley completed his book, The Yankee Whaler, and just before writing The Whaleships of New England. With an image like this, Ashley was observing Pyle’s dictum to paint what one knows best by applying his authentic knowledge of whaling culture to his art.
Beginning early in his career, N.C. Wyeth created pictures for the advertising industry—a practice he came to dislike but accepted nevertheless for the lucrative fees. In April 1941, he was contacted by the advertising manager of the E. R. Squibb Corporation, a leader in the pharmaceutical industry, with a vague direction for a commission on the theme of a mother’s concern for her family’s health and welfare. Wyeth developed the painting, which he referred to privately as “The Madonna of the Tiled Room,” using his daughter Ann and her son, John Denys McCoy, as models. Squibb reproduced this image on posters for display in drugstores and other markets for their products.
Based in Philadelphia, engraver, painter, and illustrator Alice Barber Stephens was one of the most prolific female artists of her day.
Her work regularly appeared in magazines, and throughout her career she illustrated a number of important books, including Louisa May Alcott’s Little Women and Nathaniel Hawthorne’s The Marble Faun.

The Woman in Business is one of a series of six full-page illustrations Stephens painted, collectively titled “The American Woman,” commissioned by Ladies’ Home Journal. In the series, Stephens highlighted the changing roles of women in American society. In this illustration, featuring Wanamaker’s department store in Philadelphia, she presents women of different social classes and emphasizes the prominent role of women in the workplace.
Gayle P. Hoskins (1887–1962)

A Cowboy’s Day (Slim Sees Smoke), 1931
Oil on canvas
Gift of Jane Collette Wilcox, 1982

A fledgling illustrator in Chicago, Gayle Porter Hoskins was invited to join Howard Pyle’s elite illustration school in Wilmington, Delaware, in 1907. His connections through the Pyle school helped him to earn commissions from major publications such as The Saturday Evening Post and Harper’s Weekly. The financial impact of the stock market crash in 1929 caused him to seek work in the burgeoning pulp magazine market. A Cowboy’s Day (Slim Sees Smoke) appeared on the cover of Western Story Magazine on February 21, 1931. In 1919 the publication was the first Western-themed pulp magazine. By the 1930s, it was struggling to compete with newer publications featuring more violent stories, making Western Story old-fashioned by comparison.
Frank E. Schoonover (1877–1972)

White Fang’s free nature flashed forth again, and he sank his teeth into the moccasined foot, 1906

Oil on canvas

Gift of Mr. and Mrs. Andrew Wyeth, 1985
Howard Pyle’s student Frank E. Schoonover traveled to Canada in 1902 and became fascinated with the Canadian wilderness. Acting on Pyle’s advice to immerse himself in his subject, Schoonover traveled on foot and by dogsled with Canadian trappers. The paintings and sketches he created from this experience would serve as reference material for illustrations for Jack London’s White Fang (serialized in Outing magazine from May through October, 1906). Like London’s story, Schoonover’s illustration takes the viewpoint of the wild dog-wolf. The severe angle of Schoonover’s composition and the tension of the figures—each poised to strike—heighten the drama of the moment.
Sarah S. Stilwell Weber (1877–1939)

Fairy Godmother, ca. 1907

Oil on canvas

Purchased with the Caroline Gussmann Keller Fund, 1985

I had a dream the other night When I was all in bed.

I thought a fairy came to me With wings about her head.
She was my Fairy Godmother, I knew her right away,

And I sat down upon her lap For I wanted her to stay.

These are the opening lines of Edith B. Sturgis’s poem “The Fairy Godmother,” which Sarah Stilwell Weber illustrated with this painting. Weber was among Howard Pyle’s most successful students, attending his classes at the Drexel Institute and his summer school in Chadds Ford. She specialized in images of children, as did many women illustrators of the period. Her artwork was highly sought after and appeared in leading publications including Scribner’s, Vogue, The Century Magazine, and The Saturday Evening Post, for which she created over fifty cover illustrations.

Frederic Remington (1861–1909)

The Canadian Mounted Police on a “Musical Ride”—“Charge!”, 1887

Oil on academy board Museum purchase, 1988
Mostly known for his images of the American West, painter, sculptor, and illustrator Frederic Remington was commissioned by Harper’s Weekly to visit the Blackfeet (Siksika) reservation in Calgary. The Canadian Mounted Police was one of several illustrations resulting from the 1887 trip. The diagonal line of the horses and the placement of the white horse in the foreground add a dramatic feeling of swift movement and depth to this scene. Remington’s painting was reproduced in the magazine by the wood engraving process. In order to aid in the translation of the image into carved lines, Remington worked en grisaille, or in shades of black and white, to clearly capture subtle tonal values.

William Henry Dethlef Koerner (1878–1938)

Putting on a Good Show, 1927

Oil on canvas

Gift of Ruth Koerner Oliver, 1992
German-born artist William Henry Dethlef Koerner grew up in Clinton, Iowa, working his way up as a newspaper illustrator and art editor. He eventually sought formal training at the Art Students League in New York. Later he became a student of Howard Pyle in Wilmington, where he was a classmate of Harvey Dunn, Frank Schoonover, and N.C. Wyeth. Koerner earned a reputation as an illustrator of Western scenes, such as Putting on a Good Show, which was a commission from The Saturday Evening Post. The image set the scene for the first installment of Mary Roberts Reinhart’s novel Lost Ecstasy. The budding romance of a New York socialite and a Wyoming ranch hand is alluded to in the painting. The novel later was transformed into the 1931 film I Take This Woman, starring Carole Lombard and Gary Cooper.

Howard Pyle (1853–1911)

Spring, 1901

Oil on canvas

Gift of Bertha Bates Cole, 1992, in memory of Bertha Corson Day Bates Howard Pyle’s Spring presents an allegorical figure of a young woman ensconced in a luxurious display of cherry blossoms. She gently extends three daffodils toward the viewer, while the other hand is pressed tight to her chest. The gesture suggests the act of gift-giving, which is fitting for this painting. Unlike most of Pyle’s work in this gallery, Spring was not commissioned as an illustration, but given as a wedding present to his student Bertha Corson Day in 1902. Day began studying with Pyle in 1894, completing a four-year course at the Drexel Institute and continuing as an advanced and summer school student. She created illustrations for novels, advertising, and a book of fairy tales written by Pyle’s sister Katharine in 1902. The painting also served as a farewell of sorts from her mentor. After her marriage, Day gave up commercial illustration.

Ethel Franklin Betts Bains (1877–1959)

Mother Goose, 1906

Oil on canvas

Purchased with Museum funds, 1992
The sisters Anna Whelan Betts and Ethel Franklin Betts Bains both attended classes at the Pennsylvania Academy of the Fine Arts in the late nineteenth century before transferring to the Drexel Institute to study with renowned illustrator Howard Pyle. Ethel went on to further study with Pyle at his Wilmington school. She worked steadily as an illustrator in the first decade of the twentieth century, but after her marriage in 1909, she only took occasional commissions. In this painting, which was used for two separate volumes of nursery rhymes, Betts imagines the mythical Mother Goose reading her stories to a group of children listening with rapt attention.
Peter Hurd (1904–1984)

Title page for “The Story of Roland,”

ca.1930

Oil on canvas, mounted on panel Gift of Mrs. Merrill Ford, 1997

As a young illustrator, Peter Hurd belonged to the second generation of artists influenced by Howard Pyle. Though Pyle died when Hurd was just a boy, N.C. Wyeth conveyed Pyle’s lessons and some of his signature subjects to Hurd. Believed to be among Hurd’s earliest commissions, The Story of Roland, the oldest known work of French literature, tells of the adventures of medieval knights in the time of Charlemagne. In 1930, a new edition for young readers was published by Charles Scribner’s Sons, with whom Wyeth had a strong relationship. Hurd had just married Wyeth’s daughter Henriette the year before, and Wyeth likely wanted to help Hurd make a start in the illustration world by recommending him for this commission.
Peter Hurd (1904–1984)

The Wolf and Doctor Wilkinson (Once it Chased Doctor Wilkinson into the Very Town Itself), 1909

Oil on canvas

Gift of Mr. and Mrs. Howard P. Brokaw, 2007

 Howard Pyle’s short story “The Salem Wolf,” was published in Harper’s Monthly Magazine in 1909. The wolf of the title is actually a young woman who has been cursed by a witch and transformed into a werewolf. The focus of the painting is the figure of Doctor Wilkinson, whose heavy, dark, flapping coat contrasts sharply against the snowy backdrop as he flees his pursuer. The horror of the scene is directed towards the viewer and accentuated by the artist’s attention to the animal’s crazed eyes and the panicked face of Doctor Wilkinson. Within this dramatic viewpoint, the figures’ exaggerated sizes and postures heighten the action as they leap toward the viewer. The eerie glow of the rising moon casts an essential layer of fantasy over the scene.
N.C. Wyeth (1882–1945)

Untitled, 1944

Cover for The Country Gentleman

(June 1944)

Oil on hardboard

Bequest of Margaret S. Butterfield, 2005

In June of 1944, N.C. Wyeth’s painting of farmers in the Brandywine Valley graced the cover of Country Gentleman, which was then America’s foremost rural agricultural magazine. An editor’s note inside explained “Chadds Ford, of Pennsylvania Revolutionary fame, sets the scene for our haymakers. That’s the historic Brandywine Creek you see in the background. It was done from N.C. Wyeth’s studio window—country he’s been painting for forty years.”

Wyeth posed his young grandson Denys McCoy on a hay-covered platform, holding reins in his hands, as a model for this painting. This is one among several covers Wyeth completed for the magazine. By the 1940s, some of the publication’s covers were photographic, while others came from leading American regionalist artists including John Steuart Curry and Thomas Hart Benton.
Howard Pyle (1853–1911)

_Thereafter she clung close about Randver,_

1910

Oil on canvas

Gift of Lucy Cabell Pyle Summerell, 2006

In this illustration for a 1909 story entitled

“Swanhild,” a retelling of the Volsunga Saga of Old Norse mythology, Prince Randver embraces the beautiful Swanhild. He is taking her to a ship that will deliver Swanhild to her betrothed—Randver’s father. Along the voyage to her new home, Randver and Swanhild fall in love. Upon their return, the king puts them both to death for their romantic treachery. In the background of the painting, the aged counselor Bikki follows in the shadows. A duplicitous character, Bikki both arranged for the secret union of Randver and Swanhild and advised the king to punish the lovers by death.
Howard Pyle (1853–1911)

Queen Ysabeau in Her Carven Chair, 1908

Oil on canvas

Gift of Lucy Cabell Pyle Summerell, 2006
The story of Queen Ysabeau is but one of the fictional tales of medieval romance that appeared in James Branch Cabell’s novel Chivalry in 1909. The year before, Howard Pyle illustrated a stand-alone chapter for Harper’s Monthly entitled “The Choices,” including this image of the queen on her throne. Ysabeau, the bored Queen of England in the early-14th century, entertains herself over a holiday season by interfering with the lovers Sir Gregory Darrell and Rosamund Eastney. Eventually, she recognizes their love and approves of their marriage, even as she plots the murder of her own husband, the King.
Frank E. Schoonover (1877–1972)

And so the treasure was buried, 1915

Oil on canvas

Gift of Mrs. Harold S. Schutt, Jr., 2006

Frank Schoonover began studying with Howard Pyle in 1896 and became a prolific illustrator. Over the course of his career, he illustrated a vast array of literary themes, from World War stories and tales of the Old West to pirate lore and space fantasies. Schoonover remained in the region as a professional artist and helped to found the Delaware Art Museum. This painting was created for Harper’s Magazine but was never published. Evidence indicates it may have been intended for Schoonover’s own pirate story, “The Treasure of St. Albans.”
N.C. Wyeth (1882–1945)

Then the king . . . ran towards Sir Mordred, crying, "Traitor, now is thy death day come", 1917

Oil on canvas

Gift of Christopher W. Davenport, John F. Davenport and Juliet R. Davenport in memory of the previous owners, 2006
N.C. Wyeth illustrates this thrilling moment just before King Arthur runs Mordred through with a spear. Although The Boy’s King Arthur, edited by Sidney Lanier, abridges the original text of Le Morte d’Arthur, removing many of the questionable behaviors of the knights and all sexual references, the violence of the tale remains. In the moment after Wyeth depicts, Mordred is pierced with the spear but then thrusts himself close to Arthur, all the way to the bur of the spear, in order to strike Arthur with his sword. Mordred, completely impaled, falls dead, and Arthur, mortally wounded, collapses alongside him.
In We Escaped in the Boat, Howard Pyle illustrates a passage from the historical essay.
“New York Slave Traders” by Thomas A. Janvier, which was published in Harper’s New Monthly Magazine in January 1895. The scene records the voyage of the slave ship St. John in 1695, which was fraught with troubles, finally ending with the ship stranded on rocks. The crew escaped by boat to the nearby island of Curaçao, leaving 85 enslaved people behind. Pyle depicts the listing ship in the background, focusing attention on the men of the Dutch West Indies Company intent upon saving themselves. Those left behind on the St. John were captured days later by a British privateer.
Howard Pyle (1853–1911)

A Dream of Young Summer, 1901

Oil on board

Gift of Mr. and Mrs. Howard P. Brokaw, 2007

Originally created to illustrate Edith M. Thomas’s contemporary poem of the same name, Howard Pyle’s A Dream of Young Summer conjures visions of an enchanted land that transcends time. Pyle excelled in his ability to imagine and illustrate the fantastic scenes of romantic poems and adventure stories.

After its publication in Harper’s Monthly in June of 1901, Pyle gave the painting to the American sculptor Augustus Saint-Gaudens, in exchange for a plaster study for the head of “Victory” that graces Saint-Gaudens’s William Tecumsah Sherman monument in New York’s Grand Army Plaza. Pyle in turn used the sculpture as a model for his 1905 painting Why Seek Ye the Living Among the Dead, demonstrating their true brotherhood in art.
Norman Rockwell (1894–1978)

The Fiddler, 1921

Oil on canvas

Gift of Mr. and Mrs. Andrew J. Sordoni, III, 2019

Although not a student of Howard Pyle, Norman Rockwell is one of the remarkable illustrators who outlasted the period referred to as America’s “Golden Age of Illustration.” Best known for the paintings he did as cover illustrations for The Saturday Evening Post, Rockwell also did extensive work for other major publications. The Fiddler appeared as a cover for The Country Gentleman in October 1921, still relatively early in his career. Rockwell celebrates autumn and Halloween, represented by both the grinning jack-o’-lantern and the corn cob and autumn leaf garland. He skillfully mimics the effect of stage lighting in this painting, highlighting the musician’s expression and hands, creating an illusion of three-dimensionality.